Redstockings Women's Liberation Archives for Action

In September 1968, a public protest in the United States, a country many thought to be the home of the world's most liberated women, captured headlines around the world. The media reported the startling fact that 100 or so mostly young women believed that they needed "women's liberation." The women picketed and disrupted the widely popular Miss America Beauty Pageant, calling beauty standards and beauty competitions part of a wide-ranging "oppression" of women. "Miss America Protest Hits Beauty Slavery" read a headline from the heartland city of Louisville, KY. <sup>1</sup>

I was one of the young women at that demonstration. I had come from Florida--representing "Gainesville Women's Liberation"--and upon my return, I was fired from my job for my participation. Today, over forty years later, I am a professor of history and of Women's Studies, a field of academic study that did not exist in 1968, but that the movement behind the protest was already demanding. I am excited to introduce this microfilm publication, which I see as both a testament to the ground won over those decades and a powerful tool for further advances toward the full liberation of women and all oppressed people.

This collection mainly documents work from one of the few 1960s "Women's Liberation" organizations that has maintained a nearly continuous existence since its formation in January of 1969 --Redstockings. Redstockings was an offshoot of New York Radical Women, the group that organized the Miss America Protest and its founding members of Redstockings were proponents of what they and other kindred groups came to call "radical feminism." Indeed, Redstockings' co-founder Shulamith Firestone edited perhaps the publication most representative of the ideas of radical feminism, New York Radical Women's 1968 journal Notes From the First Year.

Most of the early Women's Liberation groups, and this included New York Radical Women and Redstockings in its earliest years, did not have official archives. This collection began with the individual files of activist Kathie Amatniek, soon to call herself Kathie Sarachild. <sup>2</sup> She joined New York Radical Women in late 1967, becoming, among other things, keeper of its bank book, an item now part of this collection. She has stayed with Redstockings through all of its phases, and is still with it now, even as I write. As Redstockings persisted, it began a more formal archiving process, and a range of early Women's Liberation Movement activists and theoreticians, from "radical feminist" Shulamith Firestone to "proletarian feminist" Marlene Dixon, have donated all or part of their files to the Redstockings collection.

As an extensive record of Redstockings's evolution over decades, this collection has singular value. But because of the fluidity of organizational membership and the connections among activists around the country in the 1960s, it also offers sources from a range of the era's Women's Liberation organizations and individual activists beyond those in Redstockings per se.

<sup>1</sup> To see this article and other coverage of the protest in the commercial media, see Series III.

Among these primary sources is previously unavailable documentation of the organizing for women's liberation in the deep south of the United States. Surprising to many even at the time, the small, north central Florida city of Gainesville, from which I came to the Miss America Protest, was home to what became one of the most influential pamphlets of radical feminism--Toward A Female Liberation Movement. Dubbed the "Florida Paper," it spread rapidly to the rest of the country in the fall of 1968. Judith Brown, one of its co-authors, and I, her admiring lieutenant, soon embarked on an extensive correspondence and close political collaboration with Carol Hanisch and Kathie Sarachild, both contributors to Notes From the First Year and two of New York Radical Women's strong radical feminist proponents of "consciousness-raising."

The New York City-Gainesville correspondence and its ideas about consciousness-raising and the "pro-woman line" circulated among activists in 1968 and 1969, bearing fruit in many of Redstockings' legendary papers. The impact spread to the West Coast, as New Yorkers Jennifer Gardner, Helen Kritzler and Marjorie Stamberg migrated to the San Francisco Bay area and helped start the journal Tooth and Nail, whose articles lent their weight to the pro-woman line analysis and the consciousness-raising program. Much of the other public work of these individuals and groups is in this collection, as is the media coverage of their efforts. In addition, a trove of private correspondence, meeting notes and minutes helps provide missing links of historical context and threads of political connection.

Soil for the Growth of Women's Liberation

Redstockings was part of the militant Women's Liberation branch of Second Wave feminism that exploded into public consciousness in 1968. Until then, feminism was represented by the more moderate National Organization for Women (NOW), founded two years earlier. But "Women's Liberation" soon became the name of the whole movement and a household term. Women's Liberation terms like "male chauvinism," "male chauvinist pig," "radical feminist," "sisterhood is powerful," "the politics of housework," "the personal is political," "sexism," and "consciousness-raising" were everywhere.

Women in the United States responded in droves to the announcement of a Women's Liberation Movement, seeking out existing groups and organizing new ones. Shortly after the 1968 Miss America Protest, New York Radical Women activist Rosalyn Baxandall appeared with some NOW women on David Susskind's popular television talk show and announced her group's office address and its new publication Notes from the First Year. The many letters and journal orders that arrived in response, some of which are in this collection, made clear that people around the country were ready to respond enthusiastically and fearlessly to a Women's Liberation group that openly called itself "radical." Only a year and a half after the Miss America Protest, a pamphlet in this collection aptly called The Mushroom Effect appeared, listing contact information for hundreds of Women's Liberation groups and illustrating the exponential growth of the movement, nationally and worldwide.<sup>3</sup>

The Women's Liberation Movement was part of a general upheaval going on all over the world. Sparked in the post-World War II era by revolutionary struggles for freedom and independence from colonial rule and capitalism's imperialist developments, the powerless and oppressed were rising up against those with entrenched wealth and privilege. In the United States, the spirit of "liberation" and "freedom now" spread from the Civil Rights and Black Power Movements to movements against the Vietnam War and for Women's Liberation.

By the mid-1960s, women, both Black and white, had learned key lessons from the Civil Rights Movement and its development into Black Power. The plain spoken brilliance and transcendent spirit of African Americans, who were organizing and mobilizing against great odds, and at the risk of their lives for freedom from Jim Crow segregation, gave new life and strength to democratic principles. Discussions in the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) about "women's liberation" and "fighting your own oppressors" prompted female activists to begin thinking about organizing a mass female power base for women's freedom and equality.

Other developments also provided fertile ground for the new movement. Increased participation in the paid labor force made women less dependent on marriage. Some blue collar women jumped at the chance afforded them by Title VII of the newly won 1964 Civil Rights Act to break out of ghettoized, low-paid jobs, even rejecting protective labor laws as sexist, and bringing many thousands of charges of sex discrimination against employers. The Supreme Court's 1965 Griswold v. Connecticut ruling expanded access to contraception, as did the new birth control pill.

The Cold War also had an impact. The Communist revolutions in Russia, Eastern Europe and Asia had included abortion and contraception rights and more equal job opportunities for women. The pressures of Cold War competition combined with the new women's uprising tipped the scales of capitalist courts and legislatures toward loosening strictures on women in the "free world." This collection documents not only Women's Liberation Movement criticism of how revolutionary countries fell short on their promises to women, but awareness that the "democratic" West was delivering an even lower measure of sex equality than the "Communist" East. For example, a flier in this collection offers information on travel to an unnamed Eastern European country as one way of obtaining a safe abortion at a time when abortion was illegal in the U.S.

Radical Feminist Engine

Radical feminist theory and action were the main engines of Women's Liberation. Consciousness-raising, the program that became the educational and organizing cornerstone of the movement, was the brain child of radical feminists within New York Radical Women and a chronological look through the terminology of the first-hand sources in this collection documents this assertion. This program for deriving and spreading an analysis of women's collective condition by pooling personal experiences spread rapidly as both a method of organizing groups and developing theory. But it remained under siege from others in the movement. Criticisms ranged from too "personal," "petty," and "navel-gazing" to "anti-male" and "anti-action." The support for consciousness-raising that came from the radical feminists of the "Florida Paper's" hometown was pivotal.

Judy Brown, the “Florida Paper’s” co-author, and I, her new recruit, appreciated consciousness-raising as a powerful tool from the time we first heard Carol Hanisch and Kathie Sarachild argue for it at a small national gathering of women's liberation organizers in Sandy Springs, MD, in August of 1968. There, through the debate, we forged a political bond --that we sometimes referred to as the "life group" -- based on a synthesis of radical feminism and treasured lessons from Civil Rights Movement experience.

In the correspondence that ensued, with occasional meetings across long distances, we shared information and experience about Women's Liberation organizing in our respective cities. Together we sharpened consciousness-raising as an organizing strategy with concepts like "resistances to consciousness," "anti-womanism," "daring to tell your own experience," and "personal solutionism." Eventually these ideas became part of an overall program for consciousness-raising that Kathie Sarachild would pull together and bring to the national Women's Liberation conference a few months later in November 1968.<sup>4</sup>

In our collaboration we were also testing, sharing with co-workers in our respective cities, and further developing a realization that we dubbed "the pro-woman line." It frontally challenged a still widely prevailing idea that women were oppressed because they were “brainwashed” or “conditioned” into “low self-esteem” and that a woman could free herself by “changing her head.” The pro-woman line countered that real conditions were oppressing women: men having more power, more pay, and more freedom. They were benefiting from a system perpetuating all of that and sticking together against women to maintain it. The pro-woman theory strengthened the strategy of organizing--building a movement--instead of going in for self-improvement. “Women are messed over, not messed up,” as Carol Hanisch put it in her seminal paper “The Personal Is Political,” which this collection preserves in its original form, as part of a letter exchange. Collective solutions through united struggle were needed, not useless efforts aimed at impossible individual solutions. “Sisterhood” was more powerful than “positive thinking.”

This collection, with its inclusion of the New York City-Gainesville letters, provides public access to the earliest sources and understandings of such key women’s liberation concepts, while illustrating how Redstockings contributed to popularizing and spreading those concepts in the rebirth years.<sup>5</sup> Each of the correspondents eventually joined Redstockings and the concepts the correspondence developed became the theoretical foundation from which Redstockings and Gainesville Women's Liberation influenced the rest of the movement.

The Impact of Redstockings's Radical Feminism

Redstockings emerged in 1969 as an explicitly "radical feminist action group" under the umbrella of New York Radical Women. Shulamith Firestone and Ellen Willis, another young leading voice in New York Radical Women, founded the group and came up with the name “Redstockings” to represent the union of two traditions: the "bluestockings" label disparagingly pinned on feminists of earlier centuries--and "red" for revolution. Its first public actions had considerable impact, both within the movement and on historical developments in the United States. Redstockings introduced to the movement what would become the widespread "speak-out" tactic of attacking problems by personally and publicly breaking age-old silences about them--in other words, presenting the personal testimony of consciousness-raising in public.

The first such foray at public testimony, even before the group had decided on its name, was disrupting a 1969 New York State legislative hearing of "experts" on abortion reform--the experts consisting of 14 men and a nun. "Now let's hear from the real experts--the women!" the activists stood up and shouted, demanding that the laws be repealed completely instead of just reformed. Some began to "testify" about their then illegal abortions. The media carried widespread coverage of the disruption, including some front page news, which is in the media coverage series of this collection. In a follow-up, Redstockings held its own counter-hearing at which women who'd had illegal abortions--the real experts--testified.

The new speak-out tactic soon spread across the nation. Not many know that a similar consciousness-raising speak-out by a Women's Liberation group in Austin, Texas, inspired the young woman attorney who took women's case for control over their own bodies all the way to the Supreme Court, winning the Roe v. Wade ruling in January 1973. This is the ruling that gave women the legal right to abortion through the twenty-fourth week of pregnancy. The attorney, Sarah Weddington, was a member of Austin Women's Liberation and had herself had an illegal abortion.<sup>6</sup>

Also not widely known is that a 1970 reform in New York State's abortion law was the model for this landmark Supreme Court ruling. It was a concession precipitated by pressures from the large grass roots movement that Redstockings had helped to ignite. Researchers will find in this collection records of the feminist organizing in New York City that brought about this gain for women, including organizing for court cases, public actions, strategic analysis by activists of various struggles against the abortion laws in New York State, and postmortem commentary on Roe v. Wade.

Redstockings was also an active partisan in the movement's debates over theory and strategy, and an influential contributor to movement thinking. African American radical feminist Cellestine Ware, author in 1970 of Woman Power--the first history of the Women's Liberation Movement--commenting on the Redstockings' "Principles," wrote, "The group has produced magnificent verbalizations, which I believe to be so deeply richly insightful that they change one's construction of reality..." Ware observed that what she characterized as Redstockings's central idea, "that every woman has wisdom and knowledge through her own life experiences that will lead to working for revolutionary changes in her position," had "become a commonplace of feminism."<sup>7</sup>

In a calculated intervention in movement debates, Redstockings released a spate of soon to be classic papers at a Women's Liberation conference in New York City in late June 1969. Part of the strategy was to fight for radical feminists to retain the term "Women's Liberation,” which was in danger of being co-opted by some of the same women in the left who had earlier opposed the movement but were now calling the conference under the name “Women’s Liberation.” Because most of the Redstockings activists decided to issue the blitz of papers under the organizational name “Women’s Liberation,” the only fingerprint revealing a Redstockings origin was the post office box address. The ramifications of struggles like this one against cooptation would grow larger and more serious in the 1970s, as powerful Establishment-funded women began to “come over” to feminism, even “radical” feminism, using the ideas generated and popularized at the grass roots level to set up bases of patronage and influence in order to compete with and ultimately tone down these radical political ideas and the movement itself. Later material in this collection documents Redstockings’s evolving opposition to these developments.

Among the legendary pro-woman line papers that made their first appearance at the June 1969 conference were Patricia Mainardi’s “The Politics of Housework,” Ellen Willis’s “Consumerism and Women” and Irene Peslikis’s “Resistances to Consciousness,” as well as the “Principles,” which was released anonymously as a group statement but drafted by Kathie Sarachild. Redstockings’s list of these papers and other literature for distribution would make it into FBI files on Redstockings about the same time they would appear in mainstream published feminist anthologies.<sup>8</sup> Researchers will find records of both in this collection.

During the highpoint of feminism’s rebirth years, the allied relationship between radical feminists in Gainesville, Florida, and those in the Redstockings New York core that fertilized so many pro-woman line classics took place largely below the public radar. Signs are visible, however, in scattered places in the public record of the time and are accessible in this microfilm publication. Among these are The Radical Therapist’s special July-August 1970 issue on women, which Judy Brown edited. It is filled with articles attributed to Redstockings and Gainesville Women’s Liberation. Brown’s editorial contained an advanced and eloquent development of the pro-woman line. Other examples are Carol Hanisch’s 1969 letter reprinted in 1970 in Notes from the Second Year as “The Personal Is Political.” It contains references to the Gainesville group she was then working with, and this article, too, extensively develops the pro-woman line. Vivid signs of the “Florida Paper’s” galvanizing impact and fingerprints of the life group are also in the Notes 2 article “Them and Me,” written by an anonymous Redstocking. Its author reports on the much talked about “Florida Paper” and vehemently defends it, to the dismay of the traditional left women whose meeting she was attending. A Notes From the Second Year footnote cites the paper, its authors, and its radical feminist contribution. The Redstocking also reports on the group forbidding her to use the term “anti-woman.” All of these publications are in this collection in Series II.

Redstockings Reorganizes

Like all the dynamic grassroots groups of the Women’s Liberation Movement’s rebirth years, Redstockings was short-lived. Unlike the others, though, in 1973 some Redstockings veterans regrouped with other veterans, incorporated, and announced in a mailing sent to activists around the country: “Redstockings Reorganizes to Revive Radical Feminism... The radical women who originated: Sisterhood is Powerful, Consciousness-Raising, Women of the World Unite!, The Miss America Protest, The Personal is Political, The Politics of Housework, The Pro-woman Line, are working together again.”

Their first action was Feminist Revolution, a publication that pointed to some serious mistakes by the Women's Liberation branch and argued for a return to the radical spirit, commitment, and many of the ideas and organizing strategies that fueled the movement's early growth and success. It also included a section analyzing the implications for the Women's Liberation Movement of what The New York Times and Washington Post had already written about in 1967: that celebrity journalist-turned-feminist and Ms. Magazine founder Gloria Steinem had covertly worked with the CIA a decade earlier to report on and recast student activism.

The production and publication of Feminist Revolution had considerable impact on the larger movement and on Redstockings itself. Feminist Revolution grew into a project that unexpectedly consumed most of Redstockings' energy for nearly a decade. The response-- in the form of many excited letters from readers, favorable reviews in the feminist grass roots press, and publicity blurbs from feminist authors like Betty Friedan and Tillie Olsen-- garnered a contract with Random House to republish the book in its original form. But what ensued was a three year struggle to retain the book's section critiquing Gloria Steinem and Ms. in the Random House edition, culminating in the traumatic experience of censorship.<sup>9</sup>

Disagreements over strategy during this period led to splits among the original editors of Feminist Revolution and some of its contributors. But unlike some earlier splits among radical feminists, the women maintained a keen enough awareness of their shared convictions to continue cooperating on Women's Liberation projects. Public materials they produced independently, such as the pro-woman, radical feminist journal Meeting Ground, as well as correspondence around the split and continuing collaboration are in Series V, VI and VII of the Collection. A Feminist Revolution contributor organized the Radical Feminist Organizing Committee (RFOC), and several Redstockings veterans contributed to the Committee's publication, Feminism Lives.<sup>10</sup> With time and experience, activists gained a deeper appreciation for unity and persistence.

As the anti-feminist backlash of the 1970s intensified in the 1980s, Redstockings continued to resist feminism's retreat from revolutionary perspectives, and their own understanding of the need for these perspectives deepened. After their work was censored, the term “dictatorship of the bourgeoisie” suddenly leapt out of the Marxist classics whereas before only “dictatorship of the proletariat” had loomed large. “Bourgeoisie supremacy” also stood out for the first time, as a parallel to white supremacy and male supremacy and as a term that captured the Redstockings' growing understanding that capitalism had a strong political dimension. It was a power structure of domination, not only an economic system.

Similarly, classism, like racism and sexism, was not just an attitude or form of snobbish behavior. Class had power. The actual power of an owning class--the bourgeoisie-- was a far bigger problem than an attitude of classism, which could be held by completely powerless people. Clearly, Redstockings theory work had to continue, which it did mainly through internal discussion, as is evident in this collection from notes, correspondence and drafts for anticipated projects.

The 1980s

For Redstockings, the 1980s was a time of work on developing theory, concepts of organization, and program. In 1981 a Redstockings flyer announced, with some tongue-in-cheek irreverence, that its program would now be to supplement consciousness-raising with a grass roots women's liberation "think tank" in order to propose and test solutions as well as expose problems. In the same 1981 meeting at which Redstockings passed its "think tank resolution," the group came up with a formulated organizational structure--a first in Redstockings history, and a big step for Women's Liberation. Voting and public spokesperson power would be based on experience, track record, and common political understanding, as well as demonstrated organizational and political commitment. These rules, in the form of a chart, were supported with reasons couched in terms of benefits for women and for women's liberation.<sup>11</sup>

Perhaps no issue roiled the movement with more force than the contradiction between its commitment to an ideology of leaderlessness and the very real contributions of its leading organizers and thinkers. By 1970, charges like "Stalinism," "classism," "judgmental," and "male identification"--an allegation that leadership was essentially a male trait--hounded most of these pioneers out of the very groups they had organized. Redstockings's newly adopted structure chart was proposing to test a solution to this problem. The researcher can see from the documents in this collection that even in limited circulation, the chart stimulated other organizational structure efforts, from a political artists' group in New York City to the reorganization and persistence to this day of Gainesville Women's Liberation.

Another Redstockings organizational effort in these years had a similarly stimulating effect--the Redstockings Newspanet, which was a fast, informal way of sharing information and theoretical ideas. The Newspanet, all issues of which are in this collection, is full of news of what Redstockings members were doing--recording members' accounts of other groups, Redstockings ideas and history, and participation at various events. The Newspanet also emphasized collaborative, "non-rip-off" consciousness and building trust among members, including a pledge signed by readers to credit the Newspanet when they used its ideas and material.

One creative turbulence for Redstockings in the 1980s was the resumption of intense communication, correspondence and some common projects between the Gainesville and New York allies of the 1960s--Kathie Sarachild, Carol Hanisch, Judith Brown and this author. As the women resumed political interchange and even some collaboration, their letters preserved in this collection offer their re-evaluation of earlier work together and of their split. It was an effort at reunification that was almost as stormy as the conflicts at the end of their first collaboration. But deeper understandings now enabled them to persist on a challenging common project, the Consciousness-Raising Correspondence. Redstockings and Gainesville Women's Liberation also went on to collaborate on: the Archives Distribution Project, which began to re-circulate some of the 1960s material in this collection; a community Women's Liberation class that tested ideas for combining consciousness-raising with activism and studying history, newly understood as liberation movement experience; the publication of new material; and much else--including this microfilm publication itself.<sup>12</sup> All this also drew new, young activists into the collaboration between Redstockings and Gainesville Women's Liberation.

Myth Dispelling Documents

The documents in this collection dispel so many widely accepted myths about Second Wave feminism that researchers will experience, as I did, the thrill of qualitative changes in their understanding.

The encyclopedic collection of chronologically listed and arranged primary documents from the rebirth years in Series II corrects widespread misconceptions about the dates of movement developments. A crucial distortion characterizes the feminist Second Wave as a "Seventies" movement because of the misdating of influential Women's Liberation papers. "The Myth of the Vaginal Orgasm," for example, frequently dated as 1970, was first published and disseminated in complete form in November 1968 at the first large national Women's Liberation Conference at Lake Villa, Illinois. "The Politics of Housework," also commonly misdated 1970, was first published in June of 1969 and disseminated by Redstockings at a Women's Liberation conference in New York City, as I've already discussed. Even worse, many of the groundbreaking papers and other developments of the 1960s such as consciousness-raising are given no specific date at all and are merely lumped under the rubric of "70s feminism," the reigning misnomer.

This collection presents these and other documents and developments with their original dates and in the mimeographed form in which they first began to make an impact. With correctly dated original editions and detailed chronological order, the Women's Liberation Movement's true development becomes clear, sometimes day-by-day.

This same chronological compilation of the movement's public documents, as well as this collection's extensive correspondence of activists in the South's radical feminist hotbed of Gainesville, Florida, also dispels the myth that the 1960s revival of feminism in the U.S. was just a big city movement. The movement's impact was even international before 1970, as shown by a 1969 issue of Ord & Bild, a Swedish journal that reprints sections of Notes from the First Year and the "Florida Paper." In fact, by 1970, and as a result of the 1960s actions and publications, the whole Women's Liberation Movement in Denmark adopted the name Redstockings, as publications and correspondence in this collection show.

<sup>12</sup> The microfilming only covers these programs through 1991, but many are continuing as of this publication.

In writing my book Freedom for Women, I extensively used the collection's chronological bibliography and compilation of rebirth years' media coverage.<sup>13</sup> Because of this I was able to demonstrate the spread of Women's Liberation in the 1960s with news clippings from both the commercial and movement press. Getting the Women's Liberation Movement's birth date wrong--misclassifying it as a child of the '70s--erases the pioneering groups and radical politics that made the movement popular, and denies its origins in and continuing kinship with the other '60s movements.

The collection offers primary sources that place African American women among the movement's earliest organizers, thus helping to dispel the myth that Black women generally either ignored or opposed Women's Liberation. Moreover, in contrast to much secondary literature that dates the start of Black Women's Liberation to the mid-1970s, this collection shows that African American women were there from the start. As evidence one only has to look in Series II at the range of editions of "Double Jeopardy: To Be Black and Female," the trailblazing essay by Frances Beal, who in 1968 organized SNCC's Black Women's Liberation Committee. The collection includes correspondence and notes on correspondence with African American feminists, including playwright Alice Childress and, in the 1980s, with Patricia Robinson, founder of Poor Black Women, whose statement on abortion in the summer of 1968 broke new ground for all women and was first published in the December 1968 issue of Lilith, a Women's Liberation journal in Seattle, Washington.

The collection also holds an early draft of African American feminist Mary Ann Weathers's 1969 classic "An Argument for Black Women Revolutionary Force." Incorporation papers for New York Radical Feminists on December 5, 1969 bear the signature of Black feminist and group co-founder Cellestine Ware, whose book Woman Power I have already discussed. Myrna Hill and Maxine Williams joined Redstockings in 1969 and soon became active in the Third World Women's Alliance. They also wrote and spoke about Black feminism and Black Liberation for the Socialist Workers Party. Documents of Florynce Kennedy's ongoing participation in movement development and debate thread through the collection, from correspondence giving first hand accounts of her actions and input in the early years, such as the 1968 Miss America Protest, to an unpublished article she submitted to Feminist Revolution, from her starting the Feminist Party materials in support of Shirley Chisholm to her 1989 participation in Redstockings's 20th Anniversary of the first abortion speakout.

These Black feminists were on the front lines of theory and activism. They fought for reproductive freedom, took on sexist and racist beauty standards, fought sexism within the Civil Rights and Black Power movements, confronted racism within the predominantly white Women's Liberation movement, challenged racism and sexism within the left, and investigated the ways in which male supremacy, racism, and imperialism intersect and bear down on women of color.

This collection also helps to correct the common misinterpretation that early radical feminists, and Women's Liberation as a whole, was anti-left, anti-Black Liberation movement, and anti-communist. Carol Hanisch and Elizabeth "Betita"

<sup>13</sup> Carol Giardina, Freedom for Women: Forging the Women's Liberation Movement, 1953-1970. Gainesville, Florida: University of Florida Press, 1970.

Martinez, then Elizabeth Sutherland, wrote in an article in Notes from the First Year, “We ... are economically exploited, psychologically oppressed and socially kept in 'our place' by men and by a capitalist system that has institutionalized male supremacy...”<sup>14</sup> Articles such as these were explicitly anti-capitalist and pro-socialist, while at the same time criticizing both these revolutions and capitalist democracies for prematurely claiming full women’s liberation. Correspondence and drafts of papers in Series I and VII that were circulated among radical feminists in New York City and Gainesville show that they read and discussed left classics. They also publicly recommended reading left classics as issues of No More Fun and Games and The Radical Therapist in Series II and both editions of Feminist Revolution in Series V show.

Radical feminists ardently collected and read the writings of Black Liberation and Communist movements, and the 1960s New Left. From these sources, they drew not only examples of male chauvinism but also valuable illumination for Women’s Liberation. Thus Judith Brown’s 1969 editorial published in The Radical Therapist frames the pro-woman line as theory that depends on a “materialist”--as opposed to “idealist”--outlook. Colette Price explains the ways in which China’s Cultural Revolution provided “ammunition” and “reinforcement” for the organizing ideas of the Women’s Liberation Movement. That longstanding and highly committed radical feminists understood and placed the progress of their movement in these broad contexts discredits views of Second Wave feminism as “narrow.”

Correspondence, minutes, transcripts and notes of meetings, as well as marginalia on early position papers in this collection unmask another myth. They reveal that a dialectic of passionate conflict and sharp debate, rather than sisterly supportiveness often touted as “feminist process,” powered the movement's rapid spread and the rise of its most effective organizing ideas and popular positions. The program of "consciousness-raising" and the union organizing idea of an independent power base behind "Sisterhood Is Powerful," along with "the personal is political," all represented at one time hotly-contested positions. The public and internal documents and correspondence in this collection record the context and content of the debates and conflicts in which these and other positions developed.

Not all the conflicts produced positive fruit. Others took a long time to do so. The early 1970s, as I have noted, were a time of considerable pressure on the radical Women’s Liberation pioneers, which movement theoreticians are still trying to understand. In this time, when so many of the early groups collapsed, the creative constellation of New York City-Gainesville, Florida-San Francisco Bay Area pro-woman line collaborators also foundered, as did the relationship between the Redstockings veterans and editors of the journal Notes.

However painful and sometimes difficult to follow these contentious readings can be, the assumption of the Archives for Action is that correspondence from the movement’s rough times is necessary to help scientist-activists of women’s liberation with present and future difficulties. Unfortunately, this microfilm publication has often been unable to make available both sides of a movement dispute, but from what it does contain there remains much to be learned about the seriousness and conscious intent with which Women's Liberation organizers and activists went about their work, almost always working only as volunteers. So much for another myth: that the Women's Liberation Movement was simply a spontaneous uprising.

Researchers, Scholars, Activists

This collection is clearly useful to researchers and scholars of U.S. History, Women's History, and Women's Studies—now often diffused into Gender Studies. It is also relevant to the broad fields of American Studies, Sociology, Political Science, and Social Movement Studies.

Of special interest to scholars of African American History are the copious holdings of speeches, correspondence, and publications of Black Liberation Movement organizers, some with whom Women's Liberation Movement activists worked. These include Kwame Ture, then Stokely Carmichael, of the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and All-African People's Revolutionary Party; James Forman of SNCC and the Unemployment and Poverty Action Committee (UPAC); Omali Yeshitela (formerly Joseph Waller) of the African People's Socialist Party, and more.

Public writings from the early lesbian feminist movement and unpublished writing, notes, and correspondence among Redstockings and Gainesville Women's Liberation women debating the relationship of lesbianism and the gay movement to Women's Liberation will also be of interest to Gay and Lesbian Studies scholars. Articles in the radical feminist journals Woman's World and Meeting Ground are also relevant to these debates.

Scholars of Southern History will find documents from and correspondence among Women's Liberation groups in the south including New Orleans, Atlanta, and a number of Florida cities and towns. There is also correspondence with southern social movements and radical organizations such as the Southern Conference Education Fund (SCEF), the Southern Student Organizing Committee (SSOC) and southern chapters of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS).

Women's Liberation activists participated in and studied the labor movement, and the collection contains items that will interest labor historians. These include documents on dairy farm worker organizing, the Communications Workers of America (CWA); the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees, Moving Picture Technicians, Artists, and Allied Crafts (IATSE); and participation by American Federation of Labor-Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) unions in the movement for universal health care.

The full title of the Archive--the Redstockings Women Liberation Archives for Action--expresses its purpose: "History for Activist Use." The Archives motto is "Building on What's Been Won by Knowing What's Been Done." Its folders are rich with research projects, some of which bore fruit in a public action and some of which did not. These documents are a goldmine of ideas for analysis still needed today. They range widely in subject matter from breastfeeding, tampons, and Women's Liberation's impact on the fashion industry to international comparisons of all sorts, from maternal mortality to when women got the vote on equal terms with men, and to writings on Women's Liberation from the Soviet Union and Maoist China, Vietnam, and Albania.

Sarachild's description of the History of Woman Suffrage's first three volumes, edited by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and Matilda Gage, published in 1881, aptly describes the Redstockings Archives: "Their view of history was not past-as static; but of history as movement... as continuing struggle; a history of the present as well as the past-for the future. It is a history of the arguments and the debates, not just to show progress but how it came about. Theirs was... a history to use-an arsenal for women, as they put it. It was a history by the activists, those who write history to change history." <sup>15</sup>

But what brought Redstockings to this understanding of history as a practical tool? What brought the Redstockings to be able to use history--including the materials in their Archives--in this activist way was action itself. The idea is summed up by organizer Charlie Cobb in SNCC's first African American history book:

"Call it maybe a freedom fighting history book. But before doing that, make a freedom fight." <sup>16</sup>

Researcher, scholar, activist--your own organizing with others to take action, to advance women's liberation or otherwise change history, is your best guide to this microfilm publication.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

The Redstockings' Organizational Collection, Redstockings' Women's Liberation Archives for Action, 1940s-1991 is a publication indispensable for the study of the origins and practice of 1960's and 1970's feminism. These archives are filled with first-hand description, commentary, critique, and debate about much of the theory, concepts, strategy and tactics that proved crucial to the meteoric rise of the Women's Liberation Movement--and later the struggle against its decline--all by women at its core. They are a rich source of the primary documents and discussions that were manifested by the slogans "Sisterhood Is Powerful," and "The Personal is Political." Debates regarding the practice of consciousness-raising, the "Pro-Woman Line," the Miss America Protest, and the first public abortion speak-out are amply recorded.

History

Redstockings was the name coined in 1969 by Shulamith Firestone and Ellen Willis for one of the earliest women's liberation groups of the second wave. The name represented the union of two traditions: the "bluestocking" label disparagingly pinned on feminists of earlier centuries--and "red" for revolution. Participants and associates of the group included pioneer second wave activists and theoreticians Kathie Amatniek Sarachild, Carol Hanisch, Pat Mainardi, and Judith Brown, each of whom would shape the group over the years. Included as well, are Carol Giardina and many others, whom these pioneers organized into the movement in the important centers of New York City and Gainesville, Florida.

The collaboration between activists working in the South and those working in the North lies at the heart of this collection. More than any other Women's Liberation archives available today, these papers demonstrate the link between the radical southern civil rights organizing of the Student Non-Violent Organizing Committee, the Congress of Racial Equality, and the Southern Conference Education Fund with the revolutionary project of Women's Liberation. The papers, article drafts, and speeches found here document the ways in which the Black Power movement nurtured these women's rebellion and shaped their political program and method.

Six months before the formation of Redstockings, these women forged a close political working relationship at the early women's liberation conferences in Sandy Springs, Maryland, and Lake Villa, Illinois and some of the notes taken at these events are included in this collection. Two had been leaders of the first Women's Liberation action at the 1968 mobilization of the Jeanette Rankin Brigade and helped to systematically plan the expansion of the new movement. Kathie Amatniek Sarachild coined the slogan "Sisterhood is Powerful" and pioneered the literature and practice of consciousness-raising as a foundational activity of Women's Liberation. Carol Hanisch initiated, and then critiqued, the historic protest at the Atlantic City Miss America Pageant. She also first wrote that "The Personal is Political." Patricia Mainardi penned "The Politics of Housework" and Judith Benninger Brown co-authored the incendiary pamphlet "Toward a Female Liberation Movement," a document that came to be known as "the Florida paper." Decades of passionate and fiery political correspondence between theoretician activists in New York City and Gainesville, Florida, record, in startling detail, all of the major developments in the Women's Liberation Movement.

Memory and Action

Early Redstockings members and associates also distinguished themselves by their fierce efforts to resist the retreat from revolutionary perspectives by women's rights organizations, writing and publishing Feminist Revolution in 1975. The reactions to this project, pro and con, are documented here in letters from women all over the country. Materials from later decades testify to the efforts of a core group of Redstockings veterans to ensure an accurate historical record of the rise and fall of radical women's liberation, as well as the consequences of that trajectory today.

Researchers will especially value a "chronological bibliography" of historic articles and manifestos, separate versions annotated, which was assembled by these organizers with the help of Women's Liberation veterans from around the country. This segment of the collection includes the materials that they collected for their own education from the Old Left, the New Left, the Black Liberation struggle, and the anti-colonial revolutionary experience. Included, as well, are feminist statements from key early centers in the South. Minutes and notes record the activities of a number of related early groups and publications in New York, including New York Radical Women and Woman's World. Redstockings veterans hopefully define them as Archives for Action.

Terminology

There has been no attempt to standardize or objectively define the many terms used to describe different strains of feminism, or the different approaches to the Women's Liberation Movement, the Black Liberation Movement, Black women's liberation, lesbian feminism, and many other areas of organizing over the decades covered by this collection. Instead, the collection has been indexed according to the terms developed by the participants to describe themselves and their political opponents in the movements for social change at the time at which the documents were created. A researcher will find both Liberal feminism and "Bourgeois" feminism, for example, in the subject and reel indexes. Similarly, the researcher will find entry points termed Black Liberation Movement, Black Nationalism, African American self-determination, and so on. Terms have been generously cross-referenced, however, in order to aid the researcher in the discovery of the many byways and political paths taken that may not have yet been treated in the secondary literature on second wave feminism and its broader movement context.
